

No, the results we have are not consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are expecting.
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
consistent with the run time expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are expectations. One reason for this, I believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are believe, is because we are the ones that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are that wrote the code. As result, the code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been.  The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are	expectations. One reason for this, I code is not implemented as optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are
optimally as it could have been. The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are The data for the BST and the Hash table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are table, on the other hand, seems to be consistent with what we are	The data for the BST and the Hash be consistent with what we are								